Abstract

Social media is one of the fastest growing and most popular forms of media. It is relatively new and constantly evolving making it a worthwhile research area. Twitter is a social media platform dependent on its users composing posts or tweets their followers can read. When a user likes a tweet and wants to share it with his or her followers, the retweet function will share the tweet. Professional athletes have turned to Twitter as an outlet to express themselves and communicate with a variety of different types of audiences. This study examines retweets shared by professional athletes playing in the Unites States. The study finds the most common Twitter accounts retweeted by professional athletes are run by businesses and media outlets and the tweets are typically parasocial in nature. The study also found the retweets included content about the athlete more than sixty percent of the time.

Introduction

In 2006, the social media platform Twitter was created. Like most social media sites, Twitter is dependent on its users composing posts or written messages their followers can read. These posts are referred to as “tweets”. These tweets are limited to 140 characters which is the primary feature making Twitter unique. There are multiple ways for someone to interact with another user’s tweet. There is the reply function which allows users to reply directly to the tweet, or there is the “retweet” function. When a user likes a tweet and he or she wants to share it with his or her followers, the retweet function will share the tweet, still giving the original author credit, but also crediting the secondary user for retweeting it. While tweets are limited to 140 characters, users can also attach photos or videos to enrich the content of the tweet.

Twitter is used by many different audiences such as people looking for commentary on celebrities, news, movies, technology and more (Bullas, 2010). Twitter also enhances television events and allows people to feel like they are a part of something even if they are not there physically. At the 2014 Oscars, host Ellen DeGeneres tweeted a picture of herself with other actors and actresses including Brad Pitt, Bradley Cooper, Meryl Streep and others. She took the picture while live on TV and people immediately logged on to Twitter to view the picture. The picture was retweeted over three million times becoming the most retweeted tweet in Twitter history (Jarvey, 2014).

Another entertainment industry embracing Twitter has been the sports community. Twitter has become an important part of sports communication among participants and fans (Johnson, 2013). Adweek said of Twitter's sports presence that Twitter has positioned itself well by partnering with leagues and networks like ESPN and NBC Sports (Baysinger, 2016). Many sports journalists, fans, teams, and athletes use Twitter. The Twitter timeline is an effective format for following sporting events in real time, as it allows fans to follow along chronologically. Super Bowl 49 was the most tweeted about event of the 2014-15 TV season. The second most tweeted about TV event was the Grammy's with 8 million fewer tweets than the Super Bowl (Collins, 2016). Events are not only limited to actual contests. For example, Twitter was the center of attention during National Basketball Association (NBA) free agency in 2015 during what was called "the great emoji war of 2015" (Neely-Cohen, 2016).

Not only has Twitter been used to talk about sporting events, but the professional athletes have turned to Twitter as an outlet to express themselves (Johnson, 2013). In the past, team and player public relations professionals have had primary control about what information gets from the athlete to the public. This dynamic has changed drastically with the introduction of social media, especially Twitter. Most athletes post tweets without needing permission from their employer (Johnson, 2013). For example, Sacramento Kings (NBA) center DeMarcus Cousins tweeted, “Lord give me strength” on the night of the 2016 draft, apparently voicing displeasure with his team’s transactions that night (Joseph, 2016). A sentiment like this could have more easily been prevented from becoming public in the past.

In addition to athletes using Twitter to compose their own messages, they can also use the retweet function to echo what others are saying. Having the right person retweet a message can dramatically increase the views of that tweet. A large audience, such as a popular player’s Twitter following, can be especially valuable to a company or other entity with a message it wants to send. In 2015, ESPN reported the cost of a tweet from Cleveland Cavaliers (NBA) player LeBron James is $140,000 or $1,000 a character (Rovell, 2015). Men’s Journal also reported retired NBA star Shaquille O’Neal makes an extra one to five million dollars annually from Twitter (Gray, 2016). Businesses are not the only ones that can benefit from a high profile athlete retweeting them. Any person or entity trying to build a following, grow their brand, or even get a message out to a larger audience can be greatly benefited by the right person retweeting them. In 2012, a young singer named Carly Rae Jepsen’s career skyrocketed when famous singer Justin Bieber tweeted her song to his followers (Getlin, 2012). Twitter has become so important to sports media that when a commentator is on TV, his or her Twitter handle is displayed next to his or her name. Tweets from relevant athletes, celebrities and fans are also shown and read on broadcasts often. For example, on the Emmy winning TNT program Inside the NBA, multiple tweets from fans calling show host Charles Barkley's shoes "nursing shoes". These tweets provided the show with an entire segment based on this joke (Dunne, 2016).

Twitter primarily caters to two different types of relationships, specifically social and parasocial. Social relationships within Twitter consist of multiple users aware of each other and are communicating directly. For example, tennis star Roger Federer used Twitter to communicate directly with NBA star Kobe Bryant, a fellow athlete he has a relationship with by tweeting, "Hey @kobebryant, you're already an emoji natural". Because Federer and Bryant are both aware of the other's existence, and the primary purpose of the tweet was to communicate directly from Federer to Bryant, making the interaction social (Sandritter, 2015).

Parasocial Twitter interactions on the other hand do not have the same level of intimacy. This Twitter relationship is typically focused on one user. This user is the one sending the message, usually to a large number of other users, of which he or she is only vaguely aware of their existence. For example, Utah Jazz (NBA) player Gordon Hayward tweeted to his 125,000 followers, “I want to be a great player but an even better father. Proud to do my part for the women in my life”. While Hayward does not have a personal relationship with each of his 125,000 followers, he is still engaging with them because they are interested in what he has to say. Communication researcher Alice Marwick compares the parasocial relationships on Twitter to a concert. Having access to know what celebrities are thinking and saying is like having a backstage pass to a concert. (Marwick, 2011). In essence, Twitter has given fans of celebrities an opportunity to connect through the means of parasocial relationships.

A considerable amount of research has been conducted related to athletes and the use of media. However, very little research has been done related to social media, or Twitter, and virtually no research conducted specifically on retweets in regards to professional athletes. Therefore, the purpose of this thesis is to examine the content of tweets retweeted by professional athletes, how the tweets relate to the athletes themselves, and what type of relationships are the main focus.

Literature Review

This literature review will begin with a focus on Twitter and retweeting and a look at studies about Twitter specifically related to professional athletes. Next, studies focused on the differences between social and parasocial relationships in social media will be discussed. The review will conclude with a review of the uses and gratifications theory, and how it relates to this study.

Twitter, Retweets and Professional Athletes

Twitter is a social media site accessed via a standard internet browser, or more commonly, a mobile app. Twitter can also be described as a microblogging service. Microblogging is a form of communication in which users can describe their current status, opinions, or other commentary in short posts distributed by instant messages, mobile phones, email or the Web (Java, 2007). Twitter is considered microblogging because a user is limited to 140 characters. These short messages are broadcast to all of the author's followers (Pogue, 2009). Other users can then interact with each message by using the reply function which will send a direct reply to the author or use the retweet function.

When a user likes a tweet and he or she wants to share it with his or her followers, the retweet function will share the tweet, still giving the original author credit, but also crediting the secondary user for retweeting it. Two factors can predict if a user is likely to retweet a tweet. First, if the user has retweeted or replied to the author previously, and second, if the two share common interests (Luo, 2013). Once a tweet is retweeted, it reaches an average of 1,000 users regardless of the original authors following. Also, after the initial retweet, the likelihood of that tweet being retweeted again rises significantly signifying fast diffusion of information after the first retweet. (Kwak, 2010).

While the 140 character limit can be a limitation, it also has advantages. The brevity of tweets allows them to be produced and shared without a significant amount of effort, allowing a fast paced conversational environment to emerge (Boyd, 2010). The benefit of being able to communicate quickly is that it allows people to react to moments in real time. A football game is a good example. After a play, there is only a short time, usually less than a minute, before the next play. The short fast-paced style of Twitter is able to catch these moments.

Twitter offers high-profile athletes the ability to communicate instantaneously with fans, friends and observers, bypassing the gatekeeping functions of journalists, publicists and sports officials. Their tweets can be unpredictable and occasionally controversial (Hutchins, 2011). Twitter is indeed providing increased unmediated access to what athletes want to say to their fans (Pegoraro, 2010, pp. 511).

Many fans now use Twitter to follow athletes and stay informed. Professional soccer athletes alone have a combined 107,598,814 followers (Silveira, 2016). Fans do not tend to follow a diverse group of athletes. In fact, most followers have very small diversity (60% follow less than two categories) (Silveira, 2016).

Research has helped identify the type of content athletes tweet. A study by Marion Hambrick (2010) took a sample of tweets from athletes across a variety of sports and put them into six categories including: interactivity, diversion, information sharing, content, fanship, and promotional.

The category with the most tweets was interactivity at 34%. This finding indicated athletes use Twitter for interpersonal communication between fans and friends. The next highest was diversion followed by information sharing, content, promotional, and fanship (Hambrick, 2010). This data suggests professional athletes are more interested in using Twitter for personal reasons and less for business reasons such as promotion and fanship.

Parasocial Relationships

Parasocial interaction describes the one-sided relationships that can occur between a media user and the media being consumed (Ballentine, 2005). On the other hand, in social interaction, both parties are aware of the other and talk and act with each other. The concept of parasocial relationship was originally conceived by Donald Horton and Richard Wohl in 1956. They described the relationship between spectator and performer as “seeming face-to-face” (Horton, 1956). Even on television, an actor’s nuances of appearances and gestures appear as if he or she were engaging personally or privately (Horton, 1956). In situations where the performer can receive feedback from the spectator such as a play, he or she can adjust the performance accordingly (Horton, 1956.)

From the audience perspective, researcher Gayle Stever says that celebrities are role models, and a fan’s attachment to a celebrity plays an important role in adult development, and it is at this stage when these relationships are most likely to begin. Stever also says that attachment happens in much the same way in parasocial relationships as it does in face-to-face relationships, that being through proximity and familiarity with the face, voice, and manner of the celebrity. Fan attachments are often part of the normal course of adult development in the areas of identity, intimacy, and generativity (Stever, 2011).

In 1979, Mark Levy added to Horton and Wohl's research focusing on older adults and local television news. One finding of his research was that viewers were comparing their own thoughts and opinions with those of the local newscasters (Levy, 1979). However, the feedback was not available to the newscasters like it is currently with the availability of the internet. A separate study in regards to television and parasocial interactions found that there is a strong correlation between low interpersonal communication in a person's behavior and high parasocial interactions. This correlation was more obvious with those who view television more frequently (Rubin, 2006).

Twitter has given the large, undefined side of the parasocial relationship a louder voice. Feedback is heard more frequently and quicker. For example, Steven Fry, the host of the 2016 British Academy of Film and Television Awards, made a joke about a costume designer during the show that received strong backlash on Twitter. The backlash was so strong that Fry decided to delete his Twitter account (Fox, 2016).

Online blogging and microblogging platforms have increased the amount of content that can be studied in regards to parasocial interaction. Celebrity figures, journalists and others engage in these types of relationships nearly everyday (Ballentine, 2005). Twitter can be seen as the online version of the scenario mentioned in Horton and Wohl's study in which the spectator and performer engage in an interaction that is “seemingly face-to-face”. The performer, or in this case the Twitter user tweeting to a large audience, uses language similar to that language he or she would use in a social interaction. The performer even uses feedback from the spectators and adjusts accordingly. While the relationship is parasocial, analysis does show that for celebrities who are using Twitter, the dialogue is serious, meaningful, and appears to have impact for those participating (Stever, 2013).

Uses and Gratification Theory

The uses and gratification theory initially established by Elihu Katz and Jay Blumer is an approach to interpret why people seek out specific media and what needs they are satisfying with it. In other words, the theory attempts to answer the question, what does media do for people (Katz, 1973)? In Katz’ research, he says, “For example, integration into the sociopolitical order is best served by newspaper; while ‘knowing oneself’ is best served by books” (Katz, 1973, pp 267). The theory discusses why people choose the media they do.

In 1982, researcher Alan Rubin used the uses and gratification theory to identify the reasons people watch television. In his findings he identified two types of television viewers including users for time consumption and entertainment, and users of television content for non-escapist, information seeking (Rubin, 1982).

As the internet has become a staple in society, a lot of research has been done about it using the uses and gratifications theory. In 2004, researcher Thomas Stafford identified three key gratification dimensions. These include process gratifications, content gratifications, and social gratifications. Stafford concluded that while process and content gratifications were common in the past with radio and television, social gratifications were a new addition with the internet (Stafford, 2004).

As cell-phones began to be popular, researchers began applying the theory. Researcher Louis Leung found mobility, immediacy, and instrumentality to be the strongest instrumental motives in predicting the use of the cell phone (Leung, 2000 p. 308). Intrinsic factors such as affection and sociability were also motives (Leung, 2000).

The emergence of computer-mediated communication has revived the significance of uses and gratifications. In fact, uses and gratifications has always provided a cutting-edge theoretical approach in the initial stages of each new mass communications medium (Ruggiero, 2000, p. 3). Applying this theory to Twitter, the question to be asked is, what are people seeking when they use Twitter? What can they gain from a parasocial relationship with a celebrity?

Researchers have attempted to answer this question. In a study by Cory Ballard in 2011, 216 college students were surveyed on how they use Twitter. Results suggest these Twitter users obtained more gratifications from the passive functions of Twitter rather than active functions in terms of relational maintenance and entertainment. Active functions included tweeting and providing content, mentioning other users, and direct messaging. Passive functions included searching, following other users, and retweeting. The two most used passive functions in the study were following and retweeting, suggesting that not only is receiving tweets from others a major appeal, but sharing those tweets with followers is important as well.

A study in 2010 by Gina Chen found that the more months a person is active on Twitter and the more hours per week the person spends on Twitter, the more the person gratifies a need for an informal sense of camaraderie with other users. In other words, the more a person uses Twitter, the more gratification he or she will need to receive from it (Chen, 2010).

In addition to camaraderie, researcher Danah Boyd, in 2010, compiled a non-exhaustive list of reasons why people might retweet another user's tweet. Reasons include:

- To spread tweets to new audiences
- To entertain or inform a specific audience
- To comment on the content of the original tweet.

- To make presence as a listener visible.
- To publicly agree with someone.
- To validate other's thoughts.
- As an act of loyalty, friendship, or homage.
- To refer to less popular people.
- For self gain such as to increase followers.
- To save tweets for future access.

Professional athletes seek similar gratifications as most Twitter users such as: camaraderie, interactivity, friendship, and self gain. Athletes look for the same gratifications such as camaraderie. An athlete might also use Twitter to satisfy the need of feeling included among other celebrities and athletes.

Summary of Literature

Twitter is a microblogging service with multiple passive and active functions. One of the passive functions of the platform is retweeting. Retweeting is when a Twitter user shares another user's tweet while still giving credit to the original author of the tweet. People use the retweet function for a variety of different gratifications including camaraderie, to inform, to validate or agree with someone, for self gain, and more.

Professional Athletes have also turned to Twitter as an outlet for their opinions and a way to connect with a variety of people including fans, family, teammates, other athletes, media and others. Athletes have used Twitter seeking multiple gratifications including interactivity, fan relations, and camaraderie among others.

Athletes and their followers typically participate in a parasocial relationship on Twitter. A parasocial relationship is one having many of the attributes of a one-on-one relationship, but is between a “performer” and many “spectators”. The followers of the athletes are aware of the existence of the athlete and often are very familiar with who they are. However, the athlete is unfamiliar with the vast majority of his followers.

Twitter is only ten years old and as a result, research on the topic is still new and evolving. While the result is less available literature, it also means there is plenty of research to be done. Twitter has become one of the most used communication platforms in the world with over 974 million accounts as of 2014 (Sherman, 2014). With so many people using Twitter, it is important to understand how people use it and what effect it has. This is why this study is important. It will provide new information that will make the ramifications of Twitter’s effect on professional athlete’s easier to understand.

The purpose of this study is to investigate the following research questions.

RQ1: What type of Twitter accounts or Twitter users are professional athletes likely to retweet?

RQ2: Are tweets being retweeted by professional athletes primarily social or parasocial?

RQ3: Is the content of the tweets being retweeted by professional athletes directly related to themselves?

Method

Retweets from accounts of professional athletes in the National Basketball Association (NBA), National Football League (NFL), Major League Baseball (MLB), and the National Hockey League (NHL) were compiled and analyzed. In order to decide which athletes would be included in the sample, the 13 athletes from each league with the largest Twitter following according to fanpagelist.com and tweeting-athlete.com were chosen. To ensure the sample reflects tweets of professional athletes, only active athletes were chosen. A retired athlete has different priorities and may use Twitter differently. Therefore, athletes such as retired NBA star Shaquille O'Neal who has a large following were passed over. For each athlete included in the study, 20 retweets were gathered beginning with the most recent, and finishing with the twentieth most recent. The tweets were compiled in April, 2016. Therefore, most of the tweets included in the study are in the spring or winter of 2016. However, because some of the athletes in the study retweet at a lower frequency, some retweets date as far back as April of 2012. Two athletes in the study did not have 20 retweets in their timeline including San Francisco Giants (MLB) player Brian Wilson, and Chicago Blackhawks (NHL) player Patrick Kane who had zero and three tweets respectively. In total, 1,003 retweets were included in the sample.

Content analysis was then used to analyze the sample. Michael Quinn Patton, author of Qualitative Research & Evaluation Methods defines Content analysis as "any qualitative and sense-making effort that takes a volume of qualitative material and attempts to identify core consistencies and meanings" (Patton, 2002, p. 453).

Ole Holsti, author of Content Analysis for the Social Sciences and Humanities, gives three uses of content analysis. These uses include making inferences about the antecedents of communications, describe and make inferences about the characteristics of communications, and making inferences about the consequences of communications.

Qualitative content analysis is a replicable technique for compressing many words of text into fewer content categories based on rules of coding. This technique has been used to analyze professional athlete's tweets before. Marion Hambrick used content analysis and coded tweets into categories such as interactivity, fanship, and others (Hambrick, 2010). Content analysis has also been used to research topics such as Super Bowl commercials (Kelley & Turley, 2004) and celebrity athlete endorsements in Sports Illustrated (Jones, 2000).

Content analysis typically begins with researchers reading the data word by word. It is important to avoid preconceived categories. Instead, categories should flow from the data. This is known as inductive category development (Hsieh, 2005). After reading the data, initial analysis is made. Researchers then determine categories based off of their analysis (Hsieh, 2005).

Once categories have been developed, the data is read again, this time assigning it to the new categories. Once this step is completed, researchers can then analyze the results (Hsieh, 2005).

In this study, the retweets were first coded by the original author into one of the following twelve categories. The categories were created after initial analysis of the sample and are original to this study.

- Media authored tweets were written and posted by members of the national or local media, often covering the sport or team of the retweeting athlete. For example, digital media company Bleacher Report tweeted “Dwyane Wade turns up with Vanilla Ice at Heat family event” which then was retweeted by Miami Heat (NBA) player Dwyane Wade.
- Business authored tweets were written and posted by accounts representing companies, organizations, or brands such as Body Armor, Rawlings, and Ford.
- Celebrity authored tweets include tweets written by celebrity figures not directly involved in sports such as singer/songwriter Snoop Dogg, Actor Mark Wahlberg, and TV host Jimmy Fallon.
- Teammate authored tweets were written and posted by the retweeting athlete’s teammates. For example, Seattle Seahawks (NFL) player Richard Sherman retweeted a tweet written by his teammate Kam Chancellor. Coaches of players are also included in this category.
- Other Athlete authored tweets include tweets written by athletes not considered a teammate of the retweeting athlete. For example, Los Angeles Lakers (NBA) player Kobe Bryant tweeted “Social Media reporting shouldn’t diminish the quality of content. #justsayin.” and was retweeted by Los Angeles Clippers (NBA) player Blake Griffin who is not a teammate of Bryant.

- League authored tweets were posted by accounts representing professional sports organizations such as the NBA, NHL, World Wrestling Entertainment, etc.
- Team authored tweets were written and posted by accounts representing teams of which the retweeting athlete is affiliated. For example, Golden State Warriors (NBA) player Stephen Curry retweeted tweets from the Warriors and Davidson University men's basketball, both teams for which he has played.
- Different Team authored tweets were written by teams of which the retweeting athlete has no affiliation. For example, Los Angeles Angels (MLB) player Mike Trout retweeted a tweet published by an NBA team account such as the Golden State Warriors.
- Fan authored tweets were written by fans of the retweeting athlete or his team.
- Self-affiliated authored tweets were posted by accounts the retweeting athlete is directly affiliated with, often charities. For example, Boston Red Sox (MLB) player David Ortiz retweeted both the David Ortiz Fund, his personal charity, and Big Papi's Kitchen, a restaurant he owns.
- Family or significant other authored tweets were written by either family members of the retweeting athlete, or significant others such as a girlfriend.
- Other Authored retweets include any account that does not fit into any of the above categories. For example, an account with the handle @think2win, is an anonymous user posting motivational messages and videos.

Once this step is complete, research question one can be sufficiently answered.

The retweets were also separated into one of two classifications, including social and parasocial. Tweets intended for just one person to read, in this case the retweeting athlete making it a conversation between just the two Twitter users, were classified as social retweets. For example, the energy company Total USA, sent a tweet directly to Mike Trout that read “Hey @MikeTrout, if you didn’t like the sign you could’ve just said so…@Angels, should we change the tagline to The Wall that Mike broke?”.

On the other hand, tweets meant for a larger audience, in this case all of the Twitter user's followers, were classified as parasocial. For example, the NBA Twitter account tweeted “From crossovers to game-winners, this highlight mixtape of A.I. is insane”, a tweet intended for all followers of the account. Once this step is completed, the data will be used to answer research question two.

Finally, the retweets were analyzed to see if the content of what was written related to the retweeting athlete himself. In order for the retweet to be tagged as self-related, it had to meet at least one of the following three criteria. The retweet had to mention the player either by name or by Twitter handle, have a picture of the athlete attached to the tweet, or have a video of the athlete attached to the tweet. In the case that the athlete was mentioned by his Twitter handle, but only to tag the athlete in the tweet so he would be notified, the tweet was not marked as self-related. An example is a tweet to Houston Rockets (NBA) player Dwight Howard that read “@DwightHoward. Got that new locker room music for you bro. That #Gravity album!”. While Howard’s Twitter handle was included in the tweet, the tweet was not about him. This data will be used to answer research question three.

In addition to the retweets being separated in the three ways mentioned above, they were also divided into four categories by league. After being separated into these groups, they were compared side by side to look for additional patterns. For example, do NBA athletes retweet the media more than NHL athletes, or which league's players retweet fans most often. Once all data has been collected then all research questions can be sufficiently answered.

Results and Discussion

This section will discuss the findings and how they answer the three research questions. For review, the research questions are as follows. What type of Twitter accounts or Twitter users are professional athletes likely to retweet? Are tweets being retweeted by professional athletes primarily social or parasocial? Is the content of the tweets being retweeted by professional athletes directly related to themselves?

Each retweet was placed into one of twelve categories. The category with the most retweets was business accounts (208, 20.74%). This fact leads to the conclusion that athletes use Twitter, and specifically the retweet function, to endorse businesses. While the relationship between each athlete and business cannot be defined with the information available, it is likely the athlete is being compensated financially for endorsing the company or product. Eight of LeBron James' twenty retweets fell into this category. He retweeted tweets authored by Nike, Beats by Dre, Blaze Pizza, and UNKNWN Miami. Seattle Seahawks (NFL) player Russell Wilson retweeted a tweet authored by Calvin Klein that included a picture of him wearing a Calvin Klein Collection tuxedo at the Grammys.

The second most popular category was media accounts (161, 16.05%). Many of these tweets were about news in the sports industry, often about the retweeting athlete or his team. These results indicate two patterns. First, athletes have a strong interest in their field of work. San Antonio Spurs (NBA) player Manu Ginobili retweeted a tweet from local reporter Mike Monroe that read, "kudos to the NBA for reducing back-to-back and four games in five nights for all teams #ExtendingCareers". The second conclusion is athletes are proud of their accomplishments and enjoy being noticed for them. Accomplishments are not limited to athletic achievements, but also charitable work. For example, Toronto Maple Leafs' (NHL) player Joffrey Lupul retweeted a tweet from Sharp Magazine including a picture of Lupul at an event with Canadian troops that read, "J. Lupul knows his job can't compare to the Canadian troops".

The third highest category, just behind media accounts, was fan accounts (152, 15.15%). These tweets revealed athletes are appreciative of their fans and enjoy interacting with them. Often times the athletes are retweeting the fans as the result of a request. A fan of Washington Capitals (NHL) player Alex Ovechkin tweeted, "@ovi8 Alex can I get a retweet for this awesome drawing of you?", a request which Ovechkin granted.

Next, team accounts finished with the fourth highest amount of retweets (94, 9.37%). Some of these tweets were interesting facts about the team like the Toronto Blue Jays (MLB) tweeting "It was 40 years ago when our history began as the American League voted to expand to Toronto. #OurMoment". Others were promotional tweets the athletes could have been asked to retweet such as the Angels (MLB) tweeting, "Don't miss Cubs vs. Halos action! Limited tix for #OpeningDay remain, tix for 4/5 available", which was retweeted by Mike Trout. Other team account tweets included game results.

Self-affiliated accounts and other athlete accounts finished with the same results (75, 7.48%). However, when other athlete accounts are paired with teammate accounts (63, 6.28%), the total jumps to 13.76% which is higher than all categories besides business, media, and fans. Athletes use Twitter to communicate with other athletes in a variety of ways. One of the most common patterns among the retweets used in this study showed athletes use Twitter to show respect to others and their accomplishments. For example, US soccer player Abby Wambach tweeted “And congrats @hopesolo for most wins for a goalkeeper in uswnt history!! #134 #shutouttoo”, which was then retweeted by the NBA’s Kobe Bryant. Both Wambach and Bryant used Twitter to show respect to US soccer goalie Hope Solo, Bryant using the retweet function. Athletes also use Twitter to show camaraderie to other athletes. Retired NFL star Tony Gonzales tweeted, “Hanging with @RobGronkowski. One of the greatest already. Imagine if we played together?”, a tweet retweeted by New England Patriots (NFL) player Rob Gronkowski.

Self-affiliated accounts were almost exclusively retweeted to promote or report on events held by charities or businesses owned by the retweeting athlete. Of New York Rangers (NHL) goalie Henrik Lundqvist’s twenty retweets, eight of them were authored by the Henrik Lundqvist Foundation, his foundation to create positive change in the lives of children and adults through education and health services. Of these eight tweets, four were to promote an upcoming event, two were to report on past events, and two were to promote the foundation in general.

The five categories with the lowest amount of retweets include celebrity accounts (62, 6.18%), league accounts (40, 3.99%), family or significant other accounts (26, 2.59%), miscellaneous accounts (26, 2.59%), and different team accounts (20, 1.99%). Retweets from celebrity accounts included a wide range of communication purposes. Some tweets were social interactions between two users like when Snoop Dogg tweeted to Toronto Blue Jays (M player Jose Bautista, “Thank u @joeybats19”. Some tweets were statements made by the celebrity the athlete agreed with such as Justin Beiber’s tweet, “#BellLetsTalk”. The BellLetsTalks hashtag is used to raise awareness on mental illness in Canada. Edmonton Oilers player Taylor Hall retweeted Beiber’s tweet to show he agrees with this cause. League account tweets that were retweeted were mostly promoting players, teams or the league itself such as the NBATV account tweeting, “We receive insight into @realtuffjuice's inspirational past and more on Beyond The Paint.” to promote NBA player Caron Butler’s book. Family or significant other retweets were often social interactions between the athlete and his family or significant other as well as pictures of family members. For example, Manu Ginobili retweeted a picture of his family tweeted by his wife.

Table 1: Original Tweet Author

	NBA	NFL	MLB	NHL	Total
Media	16.15%	17.69%	10.83%	19.34%	16.05%

Next, the retweets were separated into two categories, social and parasocial. A staggering 919 or 91.63% of the original tweets were parasocial. This data reflects the primary purpose of retweets as a whole. When a Twitter user retweets a tweet, it is sent to all followers. Because there is one “performer” and many “spectators”, it tends to lean parasocial, rather than social. Because each tweet is shown in every follower of the author’s timeline, the user composing the tweet usually has this larger audience in mind. For social interactions meant for a smaller amount of people, retweeting likely is not the best function to use. If someone wants to engage in a social interaction after reading a tweet, he or she would be better served by using the reply function in lieu of the retweet function. Therefore, most retweets will consist of tweets where the original purpose was of a parasocial nature. One exception to this thinking that accounts for many of the social retweets in this study is fans requesting that athletes retweet their tweet such as Minnesota Vikings (NFL) player Adrian Peterson retweeting a fan named Todd Peterson who said, “@AdrianPeterson would you mind re tweeting my daughters story?”.

Of the 1,003 retweets, 620 or 61.81% were self-related. In other words 61.81% of tweets retweeted by professional athletes either mention them or include a picture or video of them. One example of a self-related retweet is New York Knicks (NBA) player Carmelo Anthony retweeting USA Basketball's release of the olympic finalist roster that included himself. Another example is NFL quarterback Robert Griffin III retweeting his college coach Art Briles who said, "RG3 in the house - 2011 Heisman, 2012 NFC East Champs and Rookie of the Year #Legendary #BaylorFootballBeAChampion". Major League Baseball player Nick Swisher retweeted People Magazine's "babies" account that tweeted, "EXCLUSIVE: Second daughter on the way for @NickSwisher and @JoAnnaLGarcia!". One last example is Tampa Bay Lightning player Steven Stamkos retweeting the NHL Players Association which said, "@RealStamkos91 posing for a selfie with a fan #HockeyvilleUSA".

These results suggest athletes use the retweet function to promote themselves or better their image. The tweets did not include negative information about the athletes, only tweets placing them in a good light. Of Cincinnati Reds (MLB) player Brandon Phillip's 20 retweets, 16 were tweets from fans. Of those 16 tweets, 15 included a picture of him with the fan who composed the tweet. This practice was an effective way for him to grow in popularity. One of these tweets said, "My mom just sent me this (picture) and told me I'm no longer her favorite player smh @DatDudeBP". The self-related tweets also showed their unique athletic abilities and many of the videos attached to the tweets were highlights of the players completing spectacular plays.

Finally the data was split into four categories by league. Several things stood out when comparing the data across the different leagues. First, Major League Baseball players retweeted social tweets 14.17% of the time which is 4.7% more than the second closest, the NHL. On the other hand, social tweets only made up 2.31% of the NBA players retweets, 5.38% lower than the next closest, the NFL. One possible explanation for this trend is fan engagement. The MLB also had the highest amount of fan retweets by a large margin, 8.75%. However this statistic does not not explain the NBA's low social numbers. The NBA finished only .07% behind the NFL and 6.1% ahead of the NHL. Another explanation could be the time of year the majority of the tweets were published. NBA players are in season during the months of January and April when the majority of the tweets used were posted. Baseball players on the other hand are in the offseason or spring training. More time and less focus on work could mean more time for social activity on Twitter.

The NHL was the only league to come in under 50% and self-related tweets at just 48.15% which is 10.7% less than the NFL and 21.85% less than the MLB and NBA. One explanation for this trend is that NHL players are not mentioned as much on social media as the other three leagues. According to the 2015 Harris Poll for America's favorite sport, ice hockey finished sixth with only 6% of the vote (Harris, 2015). If this thinking correlates with Twitter, then the hockey players likely will not have as much content about themselves to retweet. However, according to the same poll, football is the number one most popular sport, but the football athletes came in behind both basketball and baseball in self-related tweets. One explanation could be that the NFL is not in season, therefore they may also not have as much self-related content to retweet.

All three research questions in this study had one similar connection. This connection is that professional athletes are using their Twitter influence for business reasons, or to strengthen some type of a personal agenda. Reasons include but are not limited to monetary gain, image construction or repair, and fan relations. The two most retweeted account types in the study were business and media accounts. Retweets were most often directed to large parasocial audiences rather than small social audiences. Finally, the retweets were more often about the retweeting athlete himself than anything else. An example of a tweet that accomplishes this was originally tweeted by the Associated Press that reads "LeBron @KingJames donates uniforms to Toronto-area school teams". LeBron James then retweeted the content. This tweet, authored by a media member, intentionally or not, was beneficial to James' image. Had it not been, it is likely that it never would have been retweeted by him.

This study also sheds light on the changing dynamic of parasocial relationships. As social media platforms are giving the audience a stronger voice and a greater opportunity to connect individually with celebrity figures, the incentives to participate in parasocial relationships are strengthened. This trend can be beneficial to both the celebrity whose brand will be strengthened as well as the audience member who will have better access to the celebrity.

Limitations

One limitation to this study was the timing of the tweets. Many of the tweets were published between January and April. Since athlete's lifestyles change dramatically from season to season, their tweeting habits do as well. For example, NBA players during this period of time are finishing their regular season and their tweets will reflect that fact. If the sample was gathered from the months of July to September the results may change quite a bit.

A second limitation is that each athlete retweets at a different frequency. The most extreme example was Pittsburgh Penguins (NHL) player Evangi Malkin whose retweets stretched from February of 2016 clear back to April of 2012. While this timeline does provide a more comprehensive sample of his retweets, the study does not account for change in habits of Twitter users over that time. Many functions or practices of Twitter have been introduced or gone extinct in the past four years. For example, when retweeting was initially installed as a function, the tweet was simply copied and pasted into the timelines of the secondary user's followers with the letters RT at the beginning. Today, the original tweet with the original authors username and profile picture are added into the timeline of the secondary user's followers with small text added identifying the retweeting user. A change like this could motivate a user to retweet more or less than they were before.

Third, twenty retweets is only a small sample of many of these athletes complete history. Some athletes have been on Twitter for more than five years and retweet at a high frequency.

Finally, the last limitation is that only the most popular athletes on Twitter were used in this study. Not only do these athletes have different habits, lifestyles, and incomes than the less popular players, but they also only account for less than two percent of the whole population.

Future Research

One question raised in this study was if the time of year affected the content being retweeted by the athletes. A future study could categorize retweets into three separate categories including season, postseason, and offseason. If the results line up more closely from league to league, it could be concluded that the season is a more predictable variable than the league or the athlete.

The parameters of this study could be applied to other celebrity groups that use Twitter with large audiences such as actors and actress, musicians, etc. Twitter is a great platform to study parasocial relationships. Future studies could look deeper into the implications of these relationships between celebrity and audience as well the effect that the relationships have on both parties.

@momoko3030 そして、何より水！ あとみんなに配るための紙皿等の日用品が手に入らず足りてない、とのことでした。
@momoko3030 有村智恵ちゃんが、色々現地で声を集めこういうものが足りないと聞いてきてくれました！ 物資は届くところも増えてるらしいんですが、来るものがほとんど一緒というか、既にあるものが結構届いていて、日用品が足りていないみたい 例えば 一番大きいサイズのオムツ 離乳食 ミルク缶 歯ブラシ
@momoko3030 支援が少しずつ行き届き始めてる事を願います。 その代わり、情報が今度は少なくなっています。報道も今はかなり少なくなっていて、ネット情報は正しい情報が判断しにくく、今の現状がわかりにくくなり始めています。 何か知っている方、できるだけ正しい情報をお願いします！
